EDUCATION

1/2011-8/2017 PhD, Ad Hoc Interdisciplinary Doctoral Program. Sponsor: Department of Germanic Studies, The University of Texas at Austin.

Dissertation Title: Colonization of the Normative Realm in the Age of Instrumentality; Committee: Dr.

Katherine Arens (chair), Dr. Kathleen Higgins, Dr. John Hoberma, Dr. Robert Jensen, and Dr. Per Urlaub. Colonization of the Normative Realm in the Age of Instrumentality aims to establish a contemporary model why apolitical actors engage in the political realm. The project intersperses practical cases with theoretical concerns, including two case studies: the role of Soccer Hooligans in the 2011 Egyptian Revolution and the Occupy Austin Movement, also 2011. The goal of these juxtapositions is to provide insights into the realities behind political theories, as I accommodate additional strands of theory that have received little attention to date in studies of political motivation. I begin by showing how inadequate Rational Choice Theory (RCT) has proven in explaining political action and then move onto employing central concepts from Heidegger, Arendt, Marcuse, Foucault, Habermas, and Wendy Brown to create a richer picture of what choice means for subjects. With the aid of the categories these thinkers provide, I then build an analytical heuristic device called the Three Realms of Action Model. My claim is that this model, which explains the relationship between the normative, political and economic realms can better explain political choice. The actions of nonpolitical actors might seem non-rational when viewed from within a purely economic realm, but switching between the three realms and the rationalities they inhabit, provides the three-pronged lens needed to make a more nuanced study of the power relations between political actors. To better illustrate how subjects negotiate the realms, I use familiar historical sites. Each historical event allows us to inhabit an epistemology that describes how the realms bargain for dominance with each other. The insight I come away with here is that the economic realm has colonized the normative and political realms in the United States. But despite the dominance of the economic realm and the one dimensionality of the US public, political action or choice is not driven solely by market rationality. In fact, there is a shifting play of the power between the three realms where we see new and competing rationalities. This allows us not only to see "choice" as a more dynamic and nuanced category but also better clues us into how it is manipulated and even subverted.
